Chair, House Committee on State Government & Elections

Re: H-5733

Dear Chairman Shanley:

I write in opposition to H 5733, A Resolution Conferring Limited Purpose Recognition to the Native American Seaconke Wampanoag Tribe (Resolution).

The Resolution would give state recognition to the Seaconke Wampanoag for the limited purpose of receiving certain enumerated benefits and protections for which Indian tribes or groups may be eligible. Recognition for the Seaconke Wampanoags would come through legislative fiat and would not involve a petition process common in other states with state recognized tribes.

The process for acknowledgement and recognition of Indian tribes is primarily a matter for the federal government. The Office of Federal Acknowledgment within the Bureau of Indian Affairs employs anthropologists, historians, and genealogists with special expertise to determine whether a petitioner should receive federal recognition. Some states also have state recognition processes. These states, like the federal government, rely on the expertise of professionals to make the recognition determination, and many have state offices or commissions dedicated to the management of Indian affairs.

Rhode Island state government does not currently have the resources to make accurate determinations about tribal existence. The Resolution does not establish a process that would include necessary input from anthropologists, historians, genealogists, or anyone else with the requisite expertise to make these determinations.

Adopting a process for the state recognition of Indian tribes is deserving of careful consideration, including hearing the concerns of Indians and Indian communities in Rhode Island. Their input on what would be pertinent and achievable criteria for recognition is important, as are their views on the process for recognition. In the past, the Administration has offered some suggestions for a process that would be more in line with the recognition processes in other states and would involve the input and expertise of professionals. The Administration stands ready to provide similar assistance again this year.

Sincerely,

Claire Richards
Executive Counsel
